A Good Resume

Dos

Keep it clear and concise

Limit it to one page — two at most

Tailor it to the exact job you are applying for

Highlight what you have accomplished, not just your daily duties

Quantify results — "cut delivery time by 20%" beats "improved service"

Be honest; never overstate or exaggerate your experience

Use simple words and strong action verbs

Include unpaid or volunteer work that shows off your skills

Don'ts

Don't add personal details like age, height, or marital status

Don't attach a photo unless the employer asks for one

Don't stuff the page with too many bullet points

Don't write general statements that could describe anyone

Don't explain why you left your previous jobs

Don't fill space with hobbies and interests

Don't use too many colors or fonts

Don't list an unprofessional email address

Practice

Write three bullet points for your current job, each with a number in it.

Swap resumes with a partner and mark one line you would cut.

Rewrite your weakest line as a short, concrete achievement.

Discussion

What do you think a good resume should look like?

Which information should go on a resume, and what should stay off it?

Is it better to use a template, or to build one from scratch?

An HR manager says they spend ten seconds on a resume. What do they see first?

What makes a resume stand out when you have little work experience?

Should a resume look the same in every country, or change from place to place?

Have you ever helped a friend fix their resume? What did you change?

Would you use AI to write your resume? Where would you draw the line?

What is the biggest mistake you have seen on a resume?